“Innovating Teaching of Languages and Cultures through Sustainability Issues”

Sponsored by Emory College Language Center and the Office of Sustainability Initiatives at Emory University, this workshop engages presenters and participants in discussions on how sustainability and modern languages can come together through innovative teaching and program development. Professors Wan-Li Ho, Simona Muratore, and Noriko Takeda will discuss the implementation of learner-centered projects on sustainability in their language courses. Professor Karen Stolley will reflect on how sustainability can be incorporated into the language curriculum across the learning spectrum by presenting programmatic practices in the Department of Spanish and Portuguese. Professor Vialla Hartfield-Mendez will facilitate brainstorming sessions among participants, aiming to bring the conversation to an even broader level of pedagogical strategy and curriculum development and explore the leadership role that language and culture can play with regard to sustainability.

We will share a dinner prepared with sustainable practices. All are invited, whether you have had experience with topics related to sustainability or not. Just bring your interest!
